By the initial attempt the girl be-comes a predetermined being. She is going to "care," to persist along cer-tain chosen lines of thought and action. She begins to feel that she has not only capacity for knowing but native ability for developing a personality of her own by varied selections of thought. From her innermost soul she commences to realize, though faintly at first, that she is to become a person. She cannot clearly tell what kind of a person, but she has determined to be something. As an edu-cational apparatus it is old fashioned and has not much meaning for this generation. The advantages, therefore, of substituting a fresher term are obvi-

The difference in meaning will be apparent from the use to which the first has been applied and the second is now being adjusted. "Building of charac-ter" and "development of personality" convey widely different ideas of motive. Character aims at position, power or place. Personality finds the true self. The one conforms according to an ethi-cal, outward pattern; the other grows according to an inner purpose of self-realization. spheres of self-consciousness.

Psychologically speaking, a girl is not a person before puberty. She cannot be said to be self-conscious; only conscious. She has not yet very much conscious. She has not yet very much of a self to call her own. She is being accountable to her superiors more than to her conscience and reason. Her law of right is obedience. She has yet to experience, according to natural laws of her being, a wonderful soul awakening, when she will say "I am I."

This is a well recognized law and needs only to be boldly admitted in this connection. Before her climacteric period the girl is responsive to impulses of heredity, imitation and other outer influences. Statements and explanable to calculation, there are of calculation. Her training will not be any less to cultural than vocational; but, rather, more cultural because of her special vocations. She will be alert to think without being told what or how she should do things. She will jump over more than one line of red tape for quick results, and promptly go ahead, independently of others in her "class." Instead of being a creature fashioned by fate, led by traditional standards, she will amend old and enact new laws. Many positions and licenses which she has inherited by convention will be relin-

Statements and explanations are more or less automatically accepted. There is no logical process of reasoning. The future is certain to her only by imagination. She reflects without question the habits and sentiments of others. She is irstinctively selfish by individual assertiveness. Wrong doing is resisted through fear of punishment or dread of disapprobation. But when in her teens she has entered the new dawn of self-consciousness. Her individuality evolves into a personality. She now no longer voluntarity conforms to the opinions, wishes and will of
